In 2012, Chad Castruita experienced a mental health crisis in that led to substance abuse, thoughts of suicide and, ultimately, homelessness. Although both his parents were educated, well-insured and well-connected in San Diego, it still took them nearly six months to find the treatment he needed to get well.

“When I was stabilized and started to put the pieces of my life back together, it resonated in me how hard it was for my own family to find support and they have the best insurance and a lot of access,” he said. “I often wondered about those families that don’t have access and are uninsured or under the Medi-Cal system in California. How do they navigate these systems?”

With the pieces of his own life put back together, Castruita set out to improve the process of finding care for mental health and substance abuse issues.
